Coke or Garland or any other statesman could be forced into the perpetration of such folly.

A TEXAN SENATOR.

By the way, Senator Maxey is especially fortunate in having been assigned the chairmanship of a committee and thus in securing the services of a clerk indispensable in the proper discharge of public and private duties imposed upon senators.

And not less fortunate was the distinguished Texan in the selection of his clerical adjutant. He happens to be a most felicitous newspaper correspondent, representing here at the capitol two of the best papers in Texas.

PERSONAL.

Since I have made this reference to one of the senators from Texas, and the GAZETTE pervades wide districts of the state, into which countless immigrants are inducted by every charm with which nature invests choicest dwelling-places of men, and since these immigrants would know something of the history of representatives of Texas in the federal capital, I would state that S. B. Maxey was born in Kentucky, I think in 1827. He became a citizen of Texas after graduation at West Point, and after distinguishing services in the Mexican war. He was eminently successful at the bar, and was chosen state senator in 1860-1, but preferred military service. He participated in most of the battles fought west of the Mississippi, and in others east of the river that made Bragg's and Joe Johnston's names and deeds ever memorable. From the ranks, as a volunteer, Maxey became major-general. Most interesting incidents affecting the personal character and conduct of this senior senator from Texas appear in Cullem's history of the graduates of the military academy of West Point. The senator is now serving his second term. He has been at the head of the committee on postal affairs and also a distinguished member of other most important committees of the senate. His speeches most sought after and deemed perhaps most effective, have reference to the postal system of the United States. He is a ready, fluent speaker, and since he is most studious, is always prepared for participation in the daily discussion of contentious questions considered by the senate. He is tall, slender, graceful in his bearing and of kindly expression of countenance. Of course, he is always well dressed. His home is in Paris, and hence perhaps his bonhomie smugness of manners. He loves to talk, and his words do escape from his lips wreathed with glowing fancies and fumes of delicious habana. He is content with God's handbook as he himself is involved in it, and like perfect, self-polished blossoms, his bonhomie is diffused by his presence, and listeners are always delighted when Senator Maxey becomes a raconteur.
